CONSERVATION AND UTILIZATION OF RURAL ARCHITECTURAL HERITAGE

By Cho, Hyeong, and Cindy

The book store emerged in response to the lack of decent cultural places in rural areas. It was not feasible to place a large amount of stock in the construction of large-scale stores. The ideal location would be low-cost and attract small businesses, which would provide not only new jobs but also unique appeal. Though a book store would not be in a direct town center or an obvious place of pilgrimage, it would be a place where people could relax and enjoy at their ease, bringing new vitality to the town.

Hanyeongwa, a famous book store in Sacheon, is a typical market village. The arched buildings here have been touched up in charming ways that make them more interesting to look at than the buildings in other villages. Some of these houses have undergone modern-style renovations and would one look out of place in a style of Korean city street. Existing structures such as the community well and a small wooden frame have been added to the original effect and on the walls between the buildings there are signs allowing the character in books. The major bookstore is the town library and wooden framework and a gabled roof, and on first sight it looks rather like a miniature of the Parisian home of fashion designer John Paul Gaultier. But in fact it is little different from the grey stone buildings with latticed window in the alley that are the traditional housing type of this area. Each has a colored window and door frame that brightens up the corner, a type of re-urbanization commonly found in Great Britain and Ireland.

Here in Luxembourg, Belgium, a book store in a rural village deep in the forest. It is surrounded by thick woods inhabited by deer, wild boar, pheasants, and rabbits. It is made of stone. Although it is not located at high altitude, when it snows it is cut off from the rest of the world. There are few houses in the village but the two houses, the house of the color pig and the house of the butcher, indeed, these two houses can only be seen between the buildings. Other than the village furniture, grunge and homes and houses and the school buildings have been put to good use and turned into bookstore and restaurants. Only the owner still serves as a book seller. The village now attracts so many visitors that a heart has also appeared.
